Not illustrated. 1838 Excerpt: .Butera gave a splendid fete at his palace on the Marina. Pascal Bruno, the universal subject of conversation, was naturally spoken of, nor did the prince hear the stories which his guests were relating of him without thinking of their extraordinary meeting under the gigantic chestnut. The reader has already heard enough of the style of Prince Butera s living, and the unbound ed liberality of his establishment, to comprehend what a fete given by him would be, when he had resolved to make it transcend in splendour any thing of the sort which had preceded it. It would be ridiculous to attempt to give the details; truth to be told, they far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of his guests, and presented to their astonished sight, something like a bright vision, or rather, as if Palermo (where to this hour it is remembered and talked of) had been for the occasion converted into a fairy-land. To give life and animation to the unparalleled splendour of the scene--the brilliant rooms--the beautiful bosquets--the brightly illuminated fountains playing in marble basins, round which the gayest groups were dancing to the sweetest music, the performers of which were left invisible, all the elite of Palermo, and their beautiful wives and daughters, dressed in the most brilliant or most extravagant costumes, were invited; some came masked, others unmasked, but all abandoning themselves to the beautiful illusion of the moment, gazing on the dance with delight, or listening en raptured to...
